RUGBYMag.com is proud to announce its selection of the 2011 Collegiate Premier Division All-Conference Teams.

These selections are a precursor to RUGBYMag.com's All-Collegiate, and CPD, DI and DII All American selections, which will be released in the coming days.

The selections were made using observations from league coaches, game reports, film study, and direct observation by RUGBYMag.com writers, editors, and correspondents. Among the criteria used for selection: players had to have played a significant part of the season – players who were injured or unavailable for most of the season, even if they were outstanding, had trouble making their All-Conference team; in addition, some players were moved to slightly different positions if, in the judgment of RUGBYMag.com, said player could handle that position (this is most noticeable in the backs, where one or two players were shifted from center to wing, for example).

"It always seems like, whenever we make these types of selections, some very good players get left off," said RUGBYMag.com Editor-in-Chief Alex Goff. "This is no exception, even though we were picking All-Conference teams – obviously the All American selections get harder. I especially feel for Central Washington, who did not get a selection on the team despite being an outstanding program, and for some specific players, especially in the back row, where St. Mary's flanker Rob Carlson, UCLA flanker Dave Martini, and Navy flanker Blake Taylor, who I think could easily have made an all-conference team, but were beaten out."

Leading the selections are s the University of California Golden Bears, which put ten players on the Pacific All-Conference team, while BYU placed seven on the West All-Conference team.

"We've been saying all year that the East was the most competitive conference in the CPD, and that was borne out in the RUGBYMag.com All-Conference selections, with seven different teams having All-Conference players," said Goff.
